

CHAPTER 1

RAINIE

Rainie stood on the edge of her bed. The small wall mirror showed only the middle of her five-foot-seven frame. Turning sideways, she looked at her butt. It still stuck out. No matter how much weight she lost, she still looked fat. She wished she hadn't eaten that piece of chicken at dinner last night. She had only eaten half of it. And she hadn't touched the mashed potatoes or corn. But she shouldn't have given in to her hunger.

She used to love her mom's fried chicken. But that seemed a lifetime ago. Back when her dad was still around. Before her mom started working at DC's Bar and Grill. Before Daymon Jenkins started hanging out at their house. Commenting on Rainie's figure. Looking her up and down, even while he was pawing her mother.

Before Rainie started locking her bedroom door at night.

Before she decided to become invisible.

What she saw in the mirror made her feel sick. She'd simply have to keep losing weight. She pulled out the scale she had hidden under her bed and stepped on it. Down to one hundred two pounds. But if she leaned on it, the needle moved a bit toward the right. Rainie shook her head in disgust. If she was going to lose this fat, she just couldn't eat anything today.

She carefully slid the scale back under her bed. She leaned forward to look at her face in the mirror. Strange. Her skin had gotten really dry, but her face had been breaking out more than usual lately. Her hair seemed to be drying out too. When she tried to style it, she would find clumps that had fallen onto her dresser.

She pulled on some warm-up pants and a long-sleeved T-shirt. Then she layered another T-shirt on top of that. Despite the Washington, D.C., heat and humidity, she always seemed to be cold.

"You still looking in that mirror?" her mother yelled up the stairs. “Rainie Burkette, how many times I got to tell you—”

Rainie started down the hall.

“Man, hard to believe she can even see herself in that mirror, skinny as she is,” she heard Daymon say.

As she made her way down the stairs, she stopped to listen.

“I don’t know what to do with her,” her mother said with a dramatic sigh. “I’ve been cooking same as always. She says she’s just not hungry.”

“Used to have some meat on her,” Daymon said. “Had herself a cute little shape. Now she’s some scrawny thing. Looks like a scarecrow. Look like she has some disease or something.”

Rainie’s heart soared at his words. It was working! If she could just get skinny enough, maybe he would quit looking at her the way he did.

She heard a chair scrape on the floor. “But now her mama’s a different story!” he said with a dirty laugh. “Her mama’s got something here and here and—”

“Oh, Daymon, stop!” her mother said in a little girl voice, giggling. “Not with the girls still here!”

Rainie knew the silence that followed meant that her mother and Daymon were kissing.

Jesika’s bedroom was at the top of the stairs. Rainie glanced up as her door opened. The nine-year-old pretended to throw up as she walked to the bathroom. Rainie clapped her hand across her mouth to keep from laughing. She thumped loudly down the remaining steps.

“Okay, I’m leaving,” Rainie said, walking into the kitchen as if she hadn’t heard anything.

Her mother broke away from Daymon, looking guilty. Her face was flushed and her hair was untidy. She was still in her nightgown, which clung to her curves and was cut low.

Rainie looked away in disgust. Since meeting Daymon, her mother had changed. Almost overnight, her mother had turned trampy. She wore clothes that were too tight and too young. She didn’t even try to hide that she and Daymon were fooling around.

Rainie knew that her mother was badly hurt when their dad left. Ever since the divorce, the mom she knew was gone. The mom who always had time to listen to her girls and was there for them. In her place was a cheap-looking stranger who only had time for Daymon. Rainie couldn't remember the last time she'd had an actual conversation with her mother about anything. All they seemed to talk about was upcoming plans. She desperately missed her "real" mom and hated this new cheap version.

Rainie knew that Daymon was the reason her mother started dressing like she did. She suspected it was because Daymon was so much younger than her mother. Besides the changes he'd caused in her mother, there was another reason Rainie hated Daymon.

He scared her. When he was in the house, Rainie was always aware of him. He followed her with his eyes whenever she walked. He also touched her. A lot. Pretending that these touches were accidental. Sometimes, when she was in the bathroom, she could hear him outside the door.

She tried telling her mother once how he made her feel. The conversation didn't go well.

"Honey, you're getting old enough to understand that men're gonna look all they want. It's what they do. And the more they look, the better you know you're looking. I don't understand why you'd want him to stop. Just shows how pretty you've gotten."

"Mom, he's your boyfriend! I don't like him looking at me."

It was at that point that the conversation took an ugly turn. "Well, what are you doing that's making him watch you so much? You tryin' to catch his eye?"

Rainie was crushed. Her mother should have backed her up, not blamed her. Rainie decided she would do all she could to try to be invisible. She stayed in her room as much as she could, coming out only when her mother made her join them for dinner or when she was leaving the house.

And she quit eating.

Not eating made her feel strong. As if she—and only she—had power over her body. But not eating hadn't taken the weight off fast enough. So she started running. One thought kept her going: the calories she was burning off. But no matter what she did, she never felt that she looked thin enough. She'd lost more than twenty-five pounds since the summer. But when she looked at herself, she still thought she looked fat.

She wondered about the other changes she'd noticed lately. Her ratty hair and skin problems. She kept thinking that her skin was breaking out because she was getting her period. But so far, nothing. In fact, she couldn't remember the last time she'd had a period. She wondered if running could be having an effect on her cycle. She made a mental note to look it up on the Internet the next time she was on a school computer.

She grabbed her backpack from the floor where she'd left it when she came in late last night. She hoped her mother hadn't noticed. She always did her homework in her room, so the backpack still in the kitchen meant she hadn't done any work. Again. But with working at FreeZees, a frozen yogurt shop, and running, she never seemed to have time to study anymore.

But her mother didn't notice the backpack. "You aren't wearing all those layers!" her mother said in horror. "In this heat? What's wrong with you lately? You comin' down with somethin'?"

“I get cold in class. They have the air conditioning turned way up,” Rainie lied. She suspected that if her mother saw her arms and legs, she’d be worried. Although Rainie looked fat to herself, other people had started commenting on how skinny she looked.

“Wait, you haven’t eaten any breakfast!” her mother said in a worried tone. “Rainie, you got to eat. I could make you something.”

“C’mon, Gabby, she’s fine, she’s just fine,” Daymon said. “Back when I was working at Coolidge, most kids just ate breakfast at school.” Daymon used to be the janitor at a neighboring high school. Rainie had once asked her mother why he didn’t work there anymore. But her mother got angry, accusing Rainie of being nosy. Rainie suspected that her mom didn’t know why Daymon had lost his job.

Daymon put his hand on Rainie’s mother’s hip and looked at Rainie with an evil smile. “Time for you to go, girl, and give us some privacy!”

Rainie felt sick at the disrespectful way he treated her mother. “I’ll eat at school,” she lied, ignoring Daymon. “I don’t want to be late,” she added, kissing her mother's cheek and heading for the door.

"Ain't you gonna kiss me good-bye?" Daymon said with a leer.

In your dreams, creep, Rainie thought. She didn't even look his way. "I'm working at FreeZees after school, so I'll see you later, Mom."

"Okay, baby," her mother said. And then, "Daymon, stop! Not yet. Jessie's still here."

Rainie slammed the door as hard as she could.